Working with International Organizations
International Organizations hiring individuals in Nonimmigrant Student (F-1) status may suggest or require that students change their nonimmigrant status to G status, the nonimmigrant category reserved for employees of International Organizations. Please be aware of the practical effects of such a change of status, including:

- Since you will not be in F status after the change, you are not eligible for F-1 benefits such as on-campus employment while in G status;
- The change to G status may be viewed by USCIS as an interruption in F-1 status for purposes of qualifying for economic hardship or practical training employment;
- Any accompanying F-2 family members would also have to change their status to G; and the process of changing back to F-1 status can take several months at some of the USCIS Service Centers.

Some International Organizations, especially large organizations such as the World Bank Group, may have internal guidelines for hiring individuals in Nonimmigrant Student (F-1) status. Students should check with the international organization before beginning the application process.
