Qualitative Data: Key Informants

Module III: Tools

This version of the Rapid Policy Assessment and Response Module has been created by Scott Burris, Kim Blankenship, Patricia Case, Tyler Crone, Kavita Misra, Sarah Hanck and Leo Beletsky as a “first draft” in the collaboration between Project Parivaratan and the Lawyer’s Collective. The next step will be review and discussion among the collaborators leading to a final draft to be deployed in East Godavari. Specific questions for discussion are highlighted in the text.

Purposes

- To learn qualitative data about key domains:
 - Police behavior towards male and female CSWs and towards HIV/AIDS and other STD-infected CSWs
 - Knowledge of, attitudes towards, and perceptions of laws relating to commercial sex work and STD infection
 - Access to social and harm reduction services
 - Social stigma and its institutional expressions
 - Social risk
 - Social attitudes

Intended Products

1. Qualitative data regarding knowledge, attitudes, and perceptions about police behavior toward IDUs, people with HIV/AIDS, commercial sex workers and other populations marginalized by laws regulating sexual behavior.
2. Qualitative data on access to harm reduction services, including what structural barriers, if any, which prevent people with HIV/AIDS, commercial sex workers and other populations marginalized by laws regulating sexual behavior from accessing those services.
3. Qualitative data on stigma, social risk, and social attitudes as they apply to people with HIV/AIDS, commercial sex workers and other populations marginalized by laws regulating sexual behavior.

Key Informant Interviews

1. There will be a total of 31 system and interactor interviews (see Table A below) and 12 sex industry interviews (see Table B). Data from CSWs will be collected during the general Parivartan sex worker interviews.
2. The interview guide is integrated, make sure you follow the skip patterns for SI and key informant interviews. Every day you should plan your interviews. Pack all the required materials in a bag; things such as extra tapes and batteries, interview guides, incentives, pens, paper, and anything else you might need to conduct interviews.
3. Qualitative interviewing is meant to produce exploratory data. Interview guides are meant to be just guides, not rigid questionnaire forms. Asking additional follow-up questions related to the comments of the participant is encouraged after asking the main questions. Prompts are written to make sure that certain areas are covered, but do not need to be asked again if the respondent has already covered that topic completely.
4. If new questions occur to the interviewer or new areas not covered on the Guide open up that are related to the experiences of CSWs with law enforcement or aspects of the occupation of sex work, the interviewer may pursue those topics. Avoid “yes or no” questions and always aim to encourage the participant to say more and tell stories about their experiences. We want the participants own words; avoid excessive prompting or “putting words in the mouths” of respondents.
5. After every interview, label and date the tape, write notes, and begin to organize your data by entering findings into a table that corresponds to our numbered topic areas. You may have to listen to relevant parts of the tape in order to remember how people responded. Be sure to find a confidential space to do this.

Number and Type of Interviews

You have learned about system, interactor and CSW key informant interviews. We are asking you to recruit and interview particular types of people as well. For system and interactor interviews, if you are unable to recruit a type of person you may interview another type of person. For example, if you are unable to recruit two police officers and can only get one, you might recruit a member of the local military as the second interview. However, before making any substitutions, ask yourself if you have exhausted every means of recruiting a police officer. It will be a much better assessment if you adhere as closely as possible to the numbers in Tables A and B. In choosing an alternative person to interview, choose someone who's role, or relationship to CSW, is as similar as possible to that of the person you were supposed to interview.

Key informants inclusion criteria: Key informants will be recruited from known contacts, on the street, from programs or wherever you are likely to find knowledgeable and talkative interview participants who are willing to share their knowledge. Inclusion criteria for key informant interviews are as follows:

- 1) Willing and able to independently consent to be interviewed
- 2) Is 18 years old or above
- 3) Meets one of the sampling category criteria
- 4) Is reported to be aware of issues relating to sex work in the system where s/he is active
- 5) Is resident in, primarily works or is believed to have direct knowledge of events in locations of interest (Rajahmundry, the highway, etc.)

General Directions

Collect data on each of the questions asked below, unless the subject does not want to answer, or does not have information relevant to the specific question. Informants might answer several questions at once. In that case the questions are there to remind you to collect information on each one. Also, for some questions, prompts are included to help you get more complete information if the informant gives very brief answers.

Definitions

In working with sampling categories the key is definitions and inclusion criteria. Before recruiting key informants, please write clear and careful definitions for each category of key informant even if “everyone knows” what a good definition is for the category. For example, madams and brokers are both legally the same, people who directly profit from the earnings of prostitutes. What is the difference between them? Gender? Place? Relationship to the CSW? How is a lodge owner different from a brothel keeper? Discussions between investigators about the definitions of each category often reveal important theoretical distinctions and areas in need of clarity. This is an important and interesting step and should not be skipped.

Definitions will be sharpened as interviews are conducted. In many ways, new definitions and distinctions between groups will emerge as interviews proceed. Nevertheless, investigators should attempt to clarify who they are trying to recruit ahead of time, but can flexibly change definitions and inclusion criteria as they proceed. Where a definition cannot be known or agreed upon in advance, it is completely acceptable to use self-definition. In that case, inclusion criteria might be written as “Persons (male or female) who self-identify as pimps and report engaging in pimping in the last 12 months”.

Here’s another example that includes a definition and a time frame. Try to put time frames in every definition so that the behavior of interest is current. Twelve months is about the right time frame to capture current work, and also captures people who may intermittently work. In addition, other constraints may be added (such as age, residence, or gender).

Ex. 1. Commercial sex worker: A person who has received money in exchange for sex at least once in the last 12 months

The next example has additional constraints. Note that the definitions are for the purposes of this study, and are constructed to provide guidance to interviewers and not to define all commercial sex workers.

Ex. 2. Commercial sex worker: A woman over the age of 18 who has received money in exchange for sex at least once in the last 12 months and is resident in Rajamundry.

The investigative team in India should write definitions with time frames for all categories in Table B (even if the definitions are quite open) before initiating recruitment or interviews. The interviewers should be provided with clear, written guidance about whom they may or may not recruit. In cases where the definitions of particular roles are unclear, investigators may wish to add other definitional questions to the module such as:

Ex 1. What is the difference for sex workers between a lodge and a brothel? How would you define the differences?
